

B. Intensive

Intensive distribution is a strategy where manufacturers aim to get their products into as many sales outlets as they can to reach a large number of customers. This strategy is commonly used for everyday items like candy bars, household products, and drinks, making them easily accessible to consumers wherever they shop.

For example, Nestle and Unilever's products are available across wide range of stores.

