

Startupology

However, founding a startup is a completely different commitment. While entrepreneurship provides the freedom to work on the personal terms, it often becomes being available 24/7 to address challenges, meet deadlines, and make critical decisions.

Unlike a 9-to-5 job with fixed hours, startups demand far more time, energy, and dedication. If the goal is to avoid a structured job, freelancing may be a better choice. But if you're starting a business, be ready to put in extra effort and embrace a "work-anytime" mindset.

3. Quick Profit

A startup is a journey where you may have to live without a salary or earnings for the first few months or even years. If you expect that the startup will give a good amount of money and a quick profit, this may prove to be a myth. Building a startup to become wealthy can be a good motivation to start, but it requires enormous work, investments, efforts, time, and energy.
