

Starting a business and expecting to make money from the first month will land you in big trouble. A startup demands relentless effort while often struggling to generate enough income to meet even basic needs. The process of building a startup can be draining, both financially and emotionally, before you even start making enough money to sustain yourself.

Hence, if your reason is to make quick money and profits by building a startup it is advisable to refrain from going ahead. If these are the reasons behind wanting to start a business, it might be worth re-evaluating your decision.

1.3 Recognising the Entrepreneurial Mindset

Now that we have explored reasons why starting a startup might not be the best choice, let's move into the mindsets needed for someone to build one. Here are the signs of an entrepreneurial mindset.

1. You are Intrinsically Motivated

People start businesses for various reasons, and motivation generally falls into two categories: extrinsic and intrinsic.

Extrinsic motivation is driven by external factors such as wealth, status, or material possessions. For example, seeing others with luxurious homes and cars may inspire you to start a business solely to achieve the same lifestyle. However, this type of motivation often leads to short-lived enthusiasm.
