

Business-to-Business to Consumers (B2B2C) Model

In the Business to Business to Consumers (B2B2C) model for services, businesses provide specialised services to other businesses (B2B), which then offer these services to individual consumers (B2C). This model involves an intermediary business (B2) that acts as a service provider or aggregator, facilitating the delivery of services from the initial business (B1) to the end consumer (C). The intermediary may enhance the service offering, manage customer relationships, or provide additional value-added services tailored to consumer needs.

Strategic Alliances

Businesses form partnerships with intermediaries to sell and manage their services more effectively.

For instance, if you offer language teaching services, you could collaborate with a foreign education consulting firm to expand your reach and access their client base. The consulting firm acts as an intermediary, promoting and selling your services to their clients in exchange for commission.
