

3. Pushing Your Limits is Natural to you

In the fast-paced environment of most startups, there's an opportunity for growth with every decision, but at the same time, it presents an equal risk of failure if you're overwhelmed by the challenges. In this situation, you'll need to push yourself beyond the comfort zone to overcome many obstacles that come the way of success.

Suppose you and your co-founder own a startup software company.

You are facing a major crisis that threatens to bring the company down. Instead of panicking, the co-founder remains calm and starts thinking of solutions.

They look for ways to help, suggesting learning new skills to address the problem.

With this proactive attitude, they successfully resolve the issues. Therefore, during crises, ask yourself the following questions -

"How can I contribute to resolving the conflict or issue?" Or "Can I up-skill myself to manage this crisis?" – then one has a positive mindset that enables them to thrive and push the limits. This mindset is not an innate quality; it can be developed over the course of time.
