

4. Ability to Handle Rejection and Take Criticism

Like you, many people are building startups. Some of their ideas might even be better than yours.

In the initial stages, you may face rejection from investors or have major ideas turned down.

This rejection can feel personal, as it critiques something you've created, which might seem like a direct attack.

However, you're on the right path if you can handle these rejections and criticisms effectively. Instead of letting them demoralise you, focus on extracting constructive feedback and using it to improve.

You should be prepared to hear "no" frequently. Just as parents can be protective of their only child and may dislike hearing criticism, entrepreneurs often feel the same way about their startup. However, like good parents, it's essential to remain open to advice and feedback that can help your child learn and grow. Similarly, for a startup, being receptive to constructive feedback can help it develop and improve.

Hence, being mentally prepared for rejection and criticism can help in receiving feedback and staying focused on improving ideas instead of dwelling on negative outcomes

