

3. Threat of New Entrants

The entry of new competitors into an industry increases competition, which can force existing players to lower prices to retain customers. In addition, they need to invest in or innovate to stay competitive. The presence of potential new entrants limits the profit potential of an industry because they bring in additional capacity and competition.

The level of threat from the new entrants depends on various barriers. These barriers include

