

3. Intuitive Decision Making

Intuitive decision-making leverages gut feelings, instincts, and subconscious processing to make quick and effective choices. However, not everyone feels confident or operates in an environment that encourages trusting their intuition. Factors such as lack of experience, fear of mistakes, or self-doubt can make it challenging to rely on intuition for decision-making.

Brian Chesky, co-founder of Airbnb, relied heavily on intuition when building his startup. In its early days, investors dismissed the idea of strangers renting out their homes. Despite skepticism, Chesky and his team trusted their instincts and focused on solving actual customer pain points. They photographed hosts' homes to make listings more appealing, a decision that wasn't backed by data but significantly boosted bookings. Rather than following traditional hospitality industry strategies, Chesky's intuition about the sharing economy helped Airbnb revolutionize travel and create a billion-dollar company.

The book "Don't believe everything you think" by Joseph Nguyen reminds us to carefully evaluate our thoughts and instincts before making decisions. In the context of intuitive decision-making, it highlights the significance of distinguishing between thoughts that arise from desperation and those that occur from inspiration.

Our thoughts may be influenced by fear, uncertainty, or external pressures, leading us to make decisions based on negative emotions or irrational impulses. Hence, it is necessary to assess our thoughts and instincts.
