

Goals can originate from two primary sources:

Inspiration and Desperation.

Goals born out of desperation often trigger negative emotions, including a sense of scarcity, urgency, and pressure to solve immediate challenges. This can lead to anxiety over missed deadlines and create an overwhelming burden. Instead of feeling motivating, such goals may feel heavy and exhausting, making it harder for individuals to sustain long-term focus and effort.

Imposter syndrome, self-doubt, and the perception of insufficient time are feelings of not having enough time to accomplish everything. Goals created out of desperation significantly impact mental well-being and productivity.

Artists paint, dancers dance, writers write, and singers sing - not necessarily for financial gain, but because of an inner drive to create something meaningful. This intrinsic motivation stems from a sense of abundance rather than lack, compelling them to express themselves. When we operate from this mindset, we pursue our goals with enthusiasm, resilience, and joy, leading to more meaningful and fulfilling outcomes.

Hence, you should allow yourself to be inspired when making decisions, which can lead to more meaningful outcomes.
