

2.1 Evaluating your Ideas - Shortlisting One Solution after Ideation

Now that you have identified several ideas, it's time to select the one that will form the foundation of your startup. The ideation phase has given you a list of ideas to work on and solve a problem. Now what actions should you take during the evaluation phase? Let's see.

Be Willing to Abandon your Initial Idea

It is expected that the initial idea might not be the best solution, get rejected, or not work out as expected. Ideation is a long process, requires considerable effort, and it is tough to come up with a solution. Once you find a solution, you become emotionally invested in it. This leads you to rationalise and justify your solutions, even if they suggest the solution may not be the best option. You cherish it like anything in the world.

To avoid this, come up with multiple ideas to work on. This way, you will avoid focusing on one idea, which helps you evaluate each idea without getting emotionally involved. Working on multiple ideas will help to explore different options by conducting research. So, assessing various ideas will help you choose the most promising one.

I have several ideas for a startup.

My initial idea might not be best solution. I need multiple ideas to evaluate and choose the promising one.

