

Now you can evaluate your ideas based on the following questions:

Market Analysis

Do you have a founder-market fit for this solution?

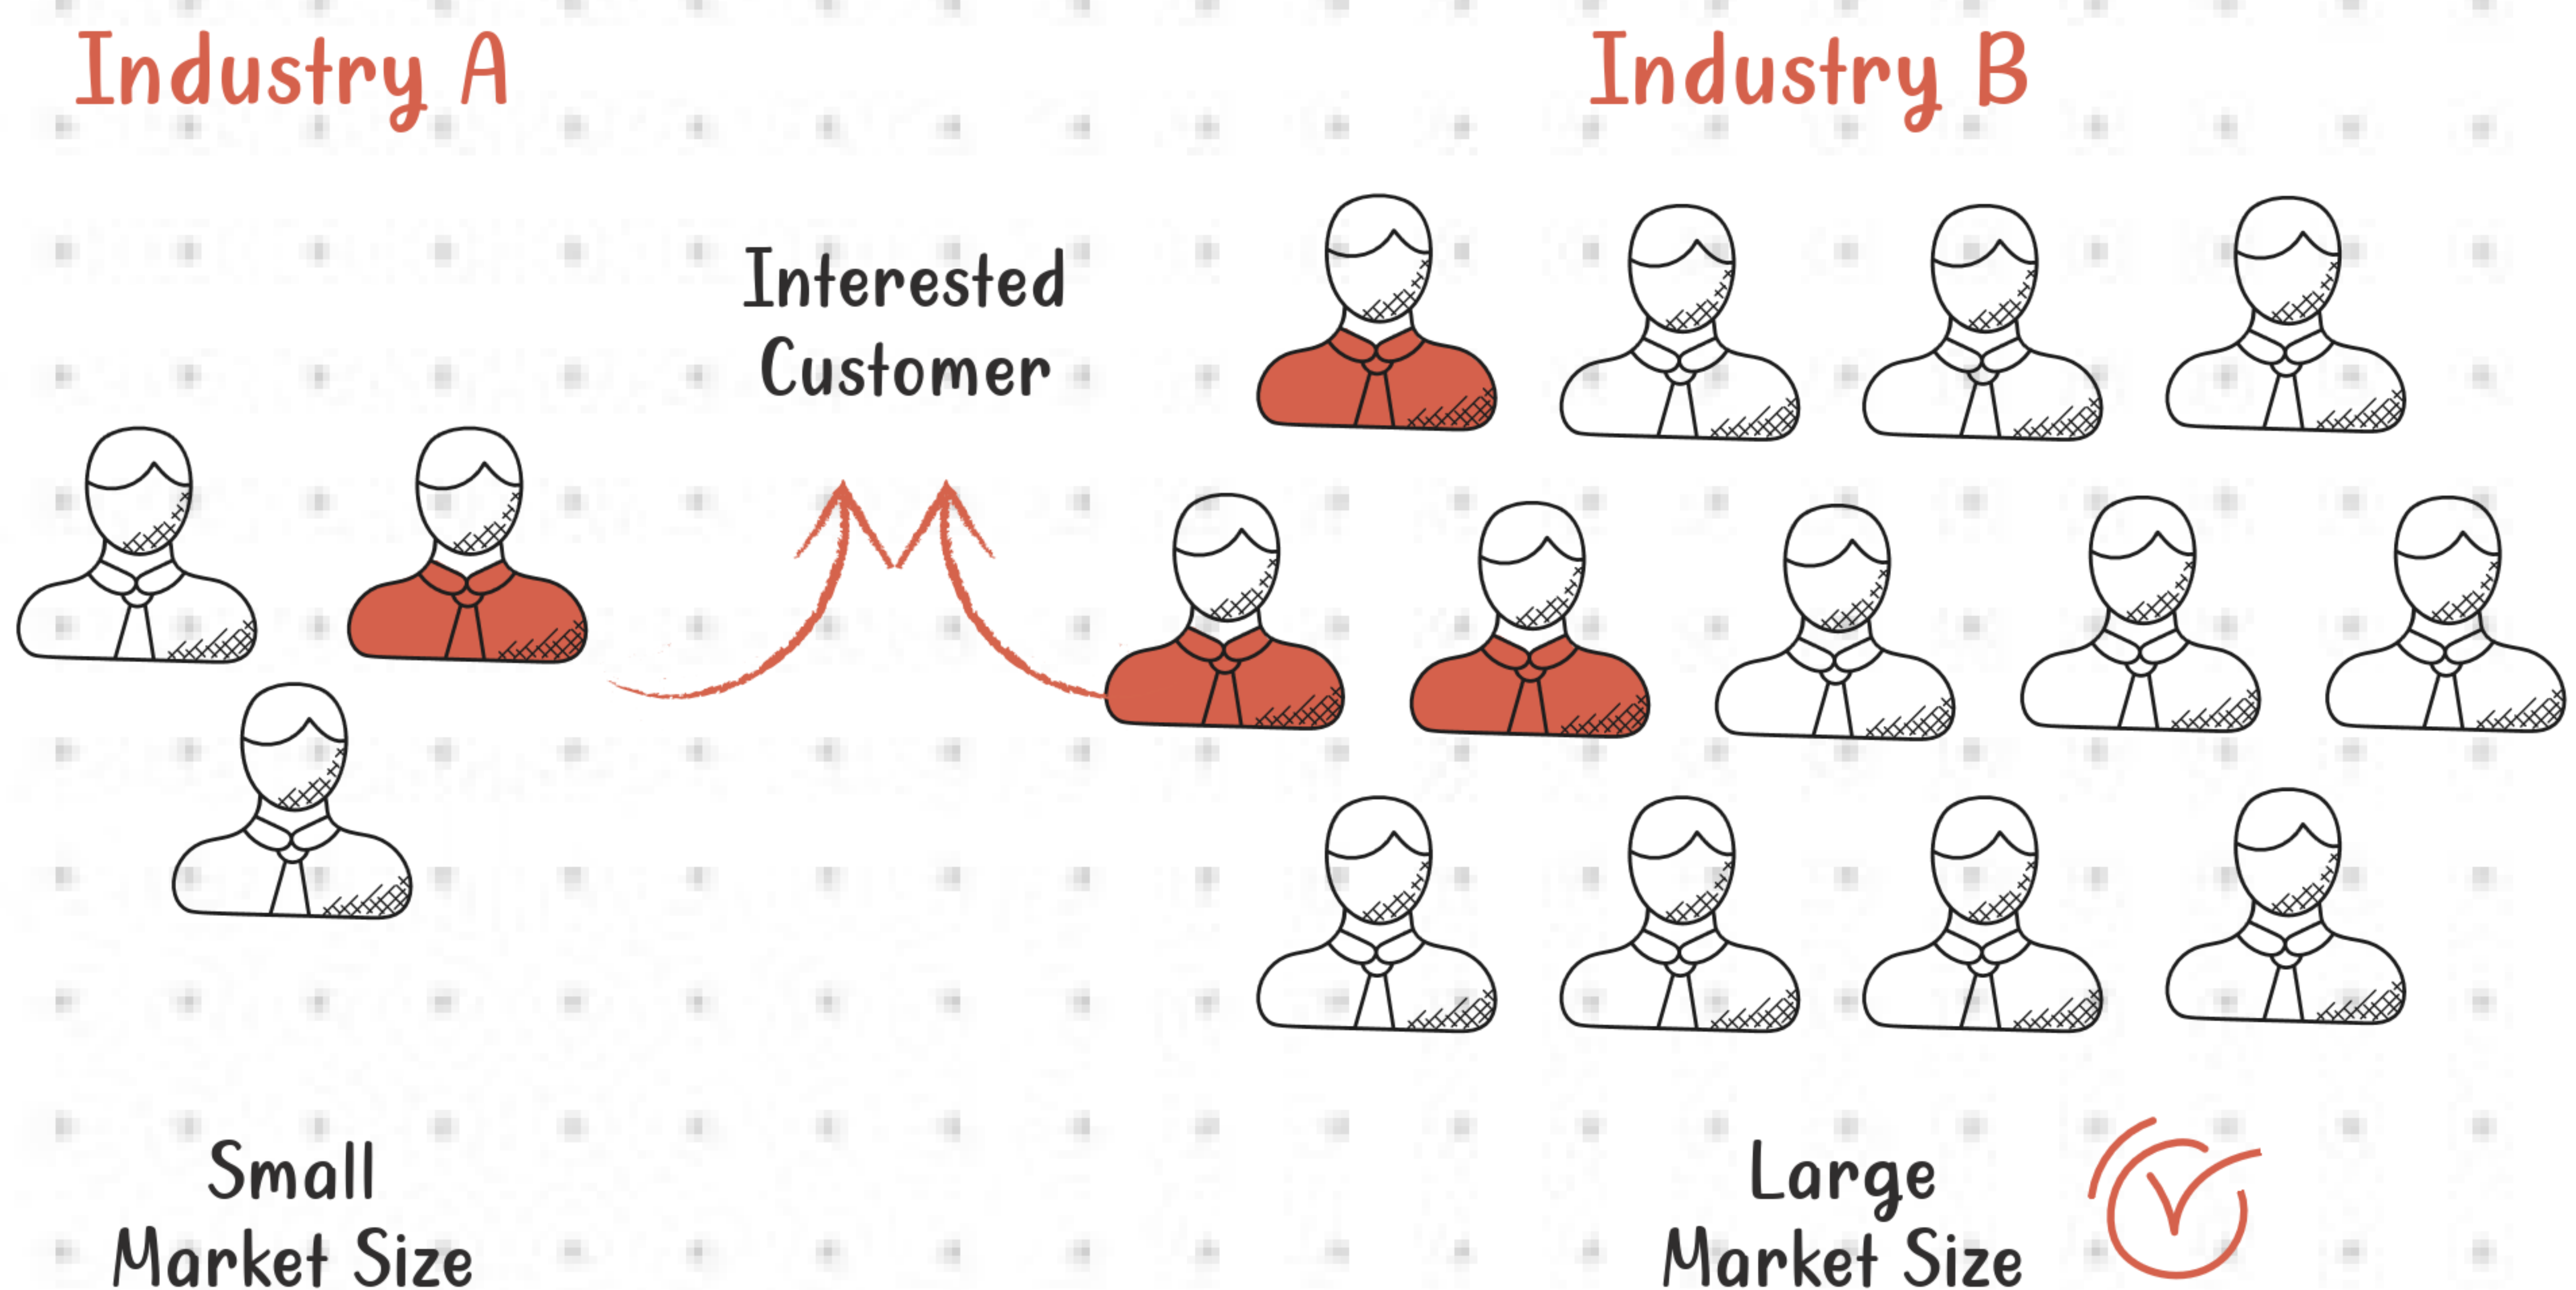

Founder-market fit means that as a founder, you have the expertise and experience in the target market and industry in which your ideas operate. It means having the knowledge, skills, and insights necessary to effectively address the problem.

For instance, when launching a startup in the beverage industry, such as an energy drink company, having founders with experience or a background in the food & beverages industry can significantly contribute to building a strong founder-market fit. Later on, it becomes essential to seek out additional team members with expertise in areas like packaging, marketing, and distribution to enhance the chances of the startup's success.

How big is the market?

Different markets have different market sizes. So it is important to understand the customer base and the demand for the products and services being offered. Understanding why previous implementations of similar solutions didn't work, have they faced any challenges and were there gaps? These insights allow you to develop solutions to address identified gaps and align with customer preferences.

How acute is the problem that you are aiming to solve?

This refers to the urgency and intensity of the problem faced by customers. A highly acute problem typically means strong demand, faster adoption, and a higher willingness to pay for a solution.