Once you know the size of the market, you should understand its growth, whether it is experiencing rapid growth or slow growth. Continuing with the above example, If more and more people are buying headphones every year, that's rapid growth. But if the number of buyers stays about the same, that's slow growth.

Competitive Landscape

This considers the level of competition in the market. Are there many competitors offering similar solutions to yours, or is the market less competitive? If your business finds it challenging to differentiate your products or services from competitors or doesn't have any Unique Selling Proposition (USP), it will be difficult to attract and retain customers.

For example, in industries like headphones and wearables, where major players already dominate the market, new ventures may struggle to gain traction. Established brands often capture the majority of customers, leaving limited opportunities for newcomers.
