

Let's see the ratio of successful companies having multiple founders vs. solo founders.

Statistics show that many successful companies have multiple founders. That is, 80% of billion-dollar companies created since 2005 have more than one founder.

20% of these successful companies were created by only one founder.

However, a study shows that many successful solo founders actually have co-creators, even if they don't have equity-sharing models or voting rights in the company, they still play a crucial role in helping the founder build their business.

If you are starting a business but still wish for support, there are ways to find co-creators to brainstorm with and work with you. A study identified three main types of collaborators who provide immense support to solo founders.
