

If you have a well-defined plan but need a co-founder with complementary skills, start by looking within your network.

Consider partnering with someone you've worked with before who possesses the expertise you need. Be clear and specific about your goals when approaching potential co-founders—this increases the chances of finding the right match aligned with your business objectives.

Before officially becoming co-founders on paper, it's important to test your compatibility. This includes regularly meeting for the creative process, working on pitching your ideas to potential customers, building prototypes together, and even working on trial projects if needed.

By doing this, you'll gain insights into each other's strengths, communication style, and ability to work together effectively. This ensures a strong foundation before committing as co-founders.
