2. Bias for Action

This principle was introduced by Jeff Bezos at Amazon.

He believes that the best way to discover innovative opportunities for customers is to constantly try out new ideas and experiments at a faster pace. In simple words, take risks, execute them quickly, and learn from both successes and failures.

Experiment at a Faster Pace

Try out New Ideas

The principle is to prioritise doing things quickly rather than sitting down to create a perfect plan. This is what Amazon has done.

They encourage their employees to take calculated risks, make decisions, and take action quickly without overthinking. The idea behind this is to experiment with things and figure out what works for them.

Amazon has constantly tried to experiment with new ideas to improve the customer experience. By doing so, Amazon discovers innovative ways to make shopping easier and more convenient for its customers. If Amazon sits back and waits for the perfect idea to come, then it misses valuable opportunities.
