a. The Financial Aspect

Let's look at the financial side of going for higher education:

i. Opportunity Cost of Your Time:

Imagine if you weren't pursuing a master's degree, you'd likely be working somewhere and earning money. The money that you could earn if you did not go for your masters is the opportunity cost of your time. If that amount is not high, or if you are okay with letting it go because of the better work opportunities you might get after getting your masters, then only you should pursue your higher education.

ii. Cost of the Loan:

If you're planning to finance your master's through a loan, remember that the loan will start accumulating interest while you're studying, and after you graduate, you'll need to start paying it back. This added financial burden should be kept in mind.
