

hundred times his money. The earliest of them, Rogers Corporation, he still owns. Motorola he still owns. Late in life, he tended to sell the ones that were long beat up, and often just before they came back to life with spectacular bounces. He did that particularly with FMC and Texas Instruments in the 1980's and Raychem in the 1990's.

Also in the 1970's something happened in his mind that I don't understand. His father had practiced medicine until very shortly before he died in 1959. In just a few years, my grandfather got what today would probably be diagnosed as Alzheimer's or some form of dementia. He quickly deteriorated, falling apart and then passing away. But Father's analysis was different. He thought his father fell apart because he stopped working; and he concluded that if he stopped working, he, too, would fall apart and die. And so he concluded he had to drive himself on. For the rest of his life, work was life itself. Slowly, he resigned himself to being able to do less, but he pushed himself to do as much as he could and did a remarkable job of it. He saw life as like a muscle—if you worked it hard, it kept working for you; but if you let it relax, it would weaken (and in his mind it would lead to decay and death). Even when, eventually, his dementia forced him to quit working completely, he resented it terribly and believed it would cause his death rather than seeing it the other way around—that his dementia was taking him down whether he worked or not. Even after the dementia was diagnosed, he kept working, with monthly visits to the neurologist to appraise the status of his condition. In 1999, with dementia impairing but not stopping him, I moved his office into his home, into my old bedroom, including everything that remained in his former office. He told his few remaining clients about his condition and they remained with him; but he could hold back the failing-memory march for only about eighteen months longer. In 2000, he gave up completely. For the next year, he talked to me steadily, asking about writing another book, how to get back into business, whether he could travel around to universities to lecture like he did to Stanford. He even made a stab at writing another book, which he envisioned as What I've Learned in the Past Twenty-Five Years. But he only got seven pages actually dictated. The energy was draining from him almost monthly, and his mental capability steadily diminished. As the disease will do, he talked about plans one morning and forgot them by afternoon. When his career was over after seventy-two years, he initially became tremendously depressed because his self-image was so linked to his career
