

second was named after my father, Philip A. Fisher. They are the only real name-sakes. My father always regretted that none of his grandchildren were named after Mother, but she didn't care. It wouldn't be like her to fret over something like that. Because Father had his own children fairly late in life, he was really closest to his oldest grandchildren. Mother, being the baby of her family, was more naturally drawn to her younger grandchildren. Two of the great-grandchildren my parents barely know. The other two they have never met, all residing far, far away. Only a few of the grandchildren have any real sense of the man I knew. They never saw the mirror.
