

using counterfeit coupons, sending their savings soaring into the impossible-to-duplicate realm, with cartloads of ill-gotten, “free” groceries in tow.

In 2012, an enormous counterfeit coupon ring out of Phoenix was busted by authorities. The counterfeiters had made millions of dollars selling phony free-product coupons online—likely to some of the Extreme Couponing shoppers, as well as shoppers attempting to recreate some of the savings levels depicted on TV.

In the post-Extreme-Couponing world, we saw manufacturers respond with additional restrictions on coupons—everything from “Limit 4 Like Coupons Per Transaction” to “Limit One Per Customer.” What other changes will the future hold for couponing? Time will tell. But I’ll be waiting—scissors in hand.

Jill Cataldo