

when you go shopping, trading in the “Give me, give me,” for an equally annoying, “Pick me, Pick me.”)

But what about the couponer’s compulsion to buy more than one item to take advantage of coupon savings? Stockpiling is the extreme couponer’s middle name. Any interest I may have had in mobile coupons promptly disappeared as soon as I realized downloaded coupons would be applied to the purchase of a single product. A one-dollar discount on one item isn’t nearly as appealing as clipping ten one-dollar coupons for ten discounted products. Extreme couponers like filling their carts with cheap and free merchandise. Just ask the Kmart Corporation.

When Kmart initially introduced an “up to $2 double coupon event” at select stores nationwide in 2007 and 2008, they limited it to a total of seventy-five coupons and four like items per customer. By shopping with my husband and filling two carts, I’d come home with a total of 150 items for less than twenty dollars. Later, they limited it to twenty-five items per person and my husband and I would go out for lunch after our first coupon spree, and then return that same day for another trip through the checkout.
