

“It doesn’t seem like a lot, but that was a yearly savings of 168 dollars, just for asking,” Christine told me. “That 168 dollars paid for our dinners out and summer piano lessons for my daughter.”

“Although we don’t need to use coupons, I can’t imagine not using them. Why pay full price when you don’t have to? The money we save sends our kids to expensive private school, summer camps, and helps us afford three major vacations a year.”

RANDI

Randi Lehman, of Syosset, New York, is in her early fifties and has been using coupons for over twenty years, despite the fact that now she and her husband’s combined income exceeds $500,000 a year. When she got married, her husband was just one year out of law school and money was tight. Her mother had always used coupons, so she decided to try it to save money. Grocery shopping became a game, seeing how much she could save each week using coupons. By the time her son was born, fifteen years ago, she discovered a website where she could trade coupons for products she used every day. With that trading opportunity, a new game began. Not only did she save money at the grocery store, but with the knowledge she gleaned from the website, she also discovered huge savings at the drugstores and even department stores. Now, her motivation is seeing how many products she can get for free or for pennies, specifically to donate to a food bank and women’s shelter. Like Rayven Perkins, she has also
