

JOHN

It isn't just women who become avid couponers. John Hoerner, of Massachusetts, used coupons even as a single guy in 1975. Using coupons then gave him a little extra spending money. When he and his wife, Pauline, got married in 1979, it was a match made in Coupon Heaven. They both have been using coupons faithfully ever since. They even call their weekly shopping trips "treasure hunts."

John benefits from the fact that their Stop and Shop and Shaw's food stores double coupons. He also finds a lot of good deals at drug stores like Rite Aid and Walgreens. Because companies often promote their new products with high-value coupons and simultaneous sales, John loves being able to sample the new product for very little outlay of cash. Besides stockpiling for their own household, John donates excess stockpiled items to a local food pantry. The couple tried selling some of their stockpiled items at a flea market for the first time in summer 2010 and found that staples, like aspirin and laundry soap, just flew off the table.

"I like the bond I've formed with employees at some the stores I regularly shop at," John comments. "Couponing has taught me to go the extra mile in being nice to the employees. They call me by my first name and greet me with a big smile."
