

Even folks who wouldn't normally use a coupon couldn't pass up a free chicken dinner.

Craig Herket, chief executive at Supervalu Inc., operator of Jewel, Albertson's, and other supermarkets, said it best in a March 8, 2010, Wall Street Journal article about coupon clipping being the newest extreme sport. He told analysts that shoppers with an eye for discounts were "executing with surgical precision." Marketers using Groupon have noticed this as well. Social promotion users are not always the relational customers the businesses had hoped for when they signed up with Groupon. According to Rice University's Jones School of Business, a study of 150 businesses running Groupon promotions between June 2009 and August 2010 found that the coupon promotions were unprofitable for 32 percent of the businesses that ran them. The businesses were disillusioned with the "extreme price sensitive nature and the transactional orientation of these consumers."

You mean, consumers like us, the extreme couponers? One respondent in the study noted: "Businesses need to consider that this class of consumers
