

I chose Psychology as my major in college precisely because I'm always wondering why, dissecting every situation, and questioning what makes another person tick. I used this degree, which I earned in 1985, to research the phenomena of coupon use and the socio-cultural and socioeconomic factors that construct it. In this case, not only am I an observer of this fascinating topic, I've also been a participant. In delving into the why behind coupon use, I hoped to unearth the secrets and motivation behind avid deal-seekers and extreme coupon users among consumers. I am not alone in pondering questions such as these. It seems there is an entire science devoted to studying just this type of thing.
