

With fewer premium and cash back refunds today, it is no longer a given that an avid coupon user will also be a refunder, or that those of us who did refunds, still do. Most of us had abandoned saving and neatly filing our trash years ago. The new generation isn't even familiar with the term "refund," instead using the word "rebate." Still, for the extreme coupon user, the idea of getting their money back on products they purchase is appealing, a good deal made even better with the added incentive to purchase.

Marketers take note, it appears as though coupons are here to stay and that they appeal to a large segment of the consumer population. The average consumer uses them to some degree, saving anywhere from five to ten dollars a week on their grocery bill. But, then, this book is not about the average coupon user. It is about the consumers who are saving much more than ten dollars a week on their groceries.
