

was particularly good. A stop at Hy-Vee for fruit and this week's good deals, using another 10–15 coupons. (4+ hours)

Day 7: Friday: Rest up in order to begin the process all over again the next day.

Two things that are obvious from this saga are: 1) I can spend an inordinate amount of time clipping, sorting, and filing coupons, planning the best strategy, and shopping, and 2) I could feasibly use the 104 coupons that qualify me as an enthusiast for a six month period in just two weeks. I've used as many as 75 coupons in one trip during planned shopping trips where doubling coupons was allowed. I know couponers who regularly use over 100 coupons a week, depending upon their family size, where they live, and the stores in the area that double.

What about the “coupon crazy”, those who might be using a thousand or more coupons in a six-month period? How are those people categorized? Combining data from the Inmar 2009 Consumer Study with a Nielsen Manufacturer Coupon Sourcing study shows two key findings of interest:
