

and I have “50¢ off” coupons, but there are plenty of occasions when I leave the store having spent one hundred dollars and (gasp!) used only a handful of coupons. My biggest savings is usually outside of the grocery store. Yet both Lisa and I identify ourselves as “Coupon Queens.” Obviously, it isn’t so easy to pigeonhole or differentiate between one saver and another.

An October 2012 Business Insider article looks at the four different kinds of savings addicts, including the “extreme couponer.” The four types of ultimate savers included:

- The Tightwad, with the financial philosophy “It hurts to spend money.”
- The Frugalist, with the philosophy “Saving money brings me joy.”
- The Food Hoarders, with the philosophy “The more I buy, the more I save.”
- The Extreme Couponer, “I enjoy getting more for less.”

Where did I fall in those categories? For years, it would have been squarely between the “extreme couponer” who bought anything that was
