

selling products to kids. He was soon known as the “Premium King,” selling premiums to General Foods, Kellogg’s, Quaker Oats, and other companies.

In the late 1940s, Gordon Gold, Sam’s son, started his own company called Premium Specialties, where he designed a line of children’s stock premiums that companies could purchase and have their name imprinted on. Gordon’s company also produced character premiums such as Gene Autry buttons, rubber band guns, and Hopalong Cassidy badges.

In 1956, Gordon Gold and his father merged their companies and started another corporation, Gold Premiums of New York and Gold Manufacturing Corporation. Gordon became President of both companies while his father acted as vice-president. In 1957, Gordon Gold sold his first order to Nabisco cereal, an order of Rin-Tin-Tin telegraph key premiums.

Sam Gold met his maker doing what he loved, dying in 1965 during a premium presentation to the Cracker Jack Company. His son ran the business until 1974 when he retired. In 1975, he presented his father’s antique toy collection, the Gold Toy Collection, to the Museum of the City of New York.
