“You’ll never understand couponing until you’ve read Coupon Crazy.

“As Mary Kenyon points out, in spite of the current furor over social media darling, Groupon and its hundreds of imitators, the use of coupons by manufacturers and retailers has been around since the late nineteenth century.

“Nielson categorizes people who use 104 coupons in a 26 week period as a “Coupon Enthusiast,” and as Mary confesses she uses at least that many in a week, so she is more than justified as describing herself as an “Extreme Couponer.”

“When it comes to coupons, the companies and businesses that issue them, and the people who clip, save, scavenge, and use them, Mary certainly knows her stuff.

“This is not just a book that is meticulously researched and full of information of value to any marketer who wishes to truly understand what a successful couponing program can achieve by stepping outside the dry nuts and bolts of data analysis, this is a book written by someone who isn’t ashamed to talk about how she and her kids used to go dumpster diving for proof of purchase and redemption tags from discarded packages.

“There are tens of thousands of “Coupon Enthusiasts” out there, it is critically important for marketers to understand what motivates them and how to incentivize them to progress from one-off opportunists to repeat customers.

“Coupon Crazy shows you how to do this. It’s also a fun read.”
