

The old coupon community that existed in the monthly bulletins or magazines has either become obsolete or moved online too, offering forums for good deal alerts and discussions on topics ranging from the correct use of coupons to tips on how to deal with an irate cashier. One of these websites, RefundCents.com, includes an off-topic forum where members can discuss anything from cancer scares to potty-training tips. Once again, I can experience that nostalgic feeling of camaraderie, a sense of being part of a frugal family.

Looking at audience profiles for websites such as RefundCents.com can give an idea of how many and what type of people are interested in coupon savings. In September of 2007, when I was initially considering writing about this subject, I checked reports from Quantcast for an audience profile for RefundCents.com. At that time, RefundCents.com ranked 92,189 among 202,679,777 websites studied and reached approximately 16,363 monthly, unique, US viewers. The site drew a more educated, mostly Caucasian, predominately female, and older audience. As noted in previous research and studies, the predominant household income of site viewers was between