

Wallets” study. They determined that 35 percent of women trust a product review from a blogger more than any user reviews on company websites. According to Quantcast, about 23 million American women are weekly readers or contributors to blogs.

Estimates of the “mommy blogger” population in the United States range from 1.8 million all the way up to 3.3 million. A survey by the Nielsen Company found that so-called “Power Moms,” ages twenty-five to fifty-four and with at least one child, represent 20 percent of the active online population. Their universal concern? Money. Within that blogger segment, composed of more than 10,000 parenting and mom-oriented blogs, Nielsen found an increasing concern about the economy, with savvy Internet shoppers scouring for money-saving strategies and good deals. There are plenty of “Mom Blogs” to choose from. Chiefmarketer.com demographics estimates there were 26 million mommy bloggers in April 2010. From family to fashion, fun, and finance, moms account for 2 trillion dollars worth of purchases annually, a fact that has advertisers scrambling to reach them as an audience.

A Chicago-based agency, Fuor Digital, recently uncovered key insights and statistics to help their clients understand the new “digital mom.” Moms with very young children are at least 50 percent more likely than the average online American to create social content and join online communities. With over half of mothers reading blogs, marketers have found yet another niche for advertising and promotion. Moms have always had a huge influence on the marketplace but the new frugality spurred by a rising unemployment rate, housing woes, and rising food prices has
