

increased the flow of traffic on websites such as Couponmom.com, one of the five most influential mom blogs of the 10,000 parenting blogs studied by Nielsen. Coupon mom Stephanie Nelson attracted 972,000 unique visitors in March of 2009, five times more than just a year earlier. There is no doubt that people are searching the Internet for ways to save money and other purchasing decisions.

According to a Forbes report on mom bloggers, the top fifteen mom bloggers influence more people than the New York Times newspaper. Brands are wise to partner with some of these influential bloggers.

Retailers and consumer product makers have definitely taken note of the influence of these mom-oriented blogs. Companies like Frigidaire and Unilever will give free samples of their merchandise to key mom bloggers to test and chat about on their sites. In 2008, Walmart Stores, Inc. joined the fray by creating an entire online community, elevenmoms.com, on its website. They spotlight women bloggers like dealseekingmom.com, couponcravings.com, beingfrugal.com, and consumerqueen.com. While
