

² In the jargon of academia, the term for experts is clinician and the term for models is actuarial process. Instead of using “clinical versus actuarial,” I use “models versus experts” to facilitate understanding within our chosen context.

³ J. Carroll, R. Wiener, J. Galegher, and J. Alibrio, “Evaluation, Diagnosis, and Prediction in Parole Decision-Making,” Law and Society Review 17 (1982): 199–228.

⁴ Joseph Walker, “State Parole Boards Use Software to Decide Which Inmates to Release: Programs Look at Prisoners' Biographies for Patterns That Predict Future Crime,” Wall Street Journal (October 11, 2013).

⁵ W. Grove, D. Zald, B. Lebow, and B. Nelson, “Clinical Versus Mechanical Prediction: A Meta-Analysis,” Psychological Assessment 12 (2000): 19–30.

⁶ Ibid.

⁷ Carson Boneck, “S&P Capital IQ: Views on Alpha Ideas for Global Equity Markets,” S&P Capital IQ (May 28, 2013), accessed February 10, 2014, http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=tThxb_eFUTo.

⁸ Joel Greenblatt, “Adding Your Two Cents May Cost a Lot over the Long Term.” Perspectives, Morningstar, January 16, 2012; <http://news.morningstar.com/articlenet/SubmissionsArticle.aspx?submissionid=134195.xml&part=2>

⁹ J. Greenblatt, “Adding Your Two Cents May Cost You a Lot Over the Long-Term,” Morningstar (2011).

¹⁰ Daniel Kahneman, Thinking, Fast and Slow (New York: Macmillan, 2012).

¹¹ Assume there are 200 females, 100 female bank tellers, and 50 female feminists in the world. It is more likely that Linda is a bank teller ($100/200 = 50\%$) because the subset of bank tellers that are also feminist