

Class Is Now in Session

but the lighting of a fire.”*

In Chapter 3, Hanky Panky, I told you a little bit about the student loan scandal. Anyone who is now facing the prospect of obtaining a student loan is probably not feeling very optimistic about the trust factor. You are very wise.

A Matter of Trust

My first advice to you is exactly what your gut is telling you: Don't trust the financial department at the college or university. Recent events have shown us that the people in charge of guiding folks to the best student loans were only guiding kickbacks right into their own pockets. Students and parents are naturally overwhelmed with the costs and the decisions of college, so they look to the college for help. They listen to the school's advisor only to later learn that the advisor couldn't care less which agency had the best deal for the students, only who had the best under the table deal for him.
