

ending. Yours can too. For more info on short sales, visit http://www.mortgagenewsdaily.com/wiki/Short\_Sale\_Defined.asp.

In this way, you can take out a low-interest loan and the cost of the house (and the amount of the loan) is less than the original purchase price and loan amount. But you can still pay the amount you were originally paying the first time you owned the house, in order to pay off that mortgage even quicker. That's right -- stick to the Debt Cures strategy, and you can get that mortgage paid off in even less than ten years!

Another method to prevent foreclosure is loan modification. It is similar to refinancing because it is a permanent change to your loan. You can negotiate a different rate or a longer term in order to get a payment you can afford and not lose your house. You are able to change your terms and save thousands of dollars. It is different from refinancing because there are no closing costs, taxes, or fees. Normally, the banks would not be inclined to do this because it means less money for them. However, these are not normal times. They realize that something is better than nothing, and keeping you in your house is best for them. If they foreclose, they have to sell it and hope to get enough to pay off what you owe.

A bird in the hand is worth something. If the bank agrees to your loan modification request, they may ask you to pay for an appraisal. That is reasonable and worth the small expense to keep you in your home and with a payment you can afford. To quote Winston Churchill, never give up. Keeping your house is worth it.

The banks and the lenders do not want us to know that we can reduce our payments, reduce our interest, and reduce the life of the loan. The banks want to keep all these strategies a secret so they can continue to sit back and count our money for the next thirty years.

No thanks. I like to count my money myself, thank you very much. I think I'll stop paying all that interest and start using my money for my own purposes. Like creating a little bit of wealth.