

Big Business

“A business that makes nothing but money is a poor kind of business.”

~ Henry Ford

As I stated in the first chapter, credit card companies are stealing from the American citizen; the federal government, instead of standing up for the rights of its citizens, is in bed with the bankers and the lenders and the fat cats, counting their money together and allowing it all to happen.

One giant credit card company improperly assessed late fees – because they had their employees hold or shred customers’ checks. Another, Provident, allegedly charged customers for things that they never ordered, like credit insurance. They wound up paying a large settlement amount, but no one went to jail and the scandal blew away with little media attention. Provident paid their settlements – $400 million – but stayed in business. Some credit card issuers referred to it as “king of the bad boys.”

What does that tell us? Obviously, there are more bad boys.

I don’t know if there is a secret handshake or if they exchange high-fives, but according to www.bcsalliance.com and attorney Robert Hinsley of www.consumersdefense.com, the consumer lending industry is overrun with bad boys.
