

“Bad Boys”

One credit card company (we’ll call it Big Bank) took the liberty of doing a truly dastardly deed. They changed the due dates on customer’s monthly credit statements. They did not notify anyone of the change; they just slipped it in, and it slipped by most people. Now that is a sneaky tactic.

The Big Banks think they can get away with anything!

We hard-working bill-paying citizens get used to what bills are due on what day. My credit card bill is always due on the 17th of every month. Well, if I had been a Big Bank customer, they could have changed my payment due date on my statement, and I would not have noticed. I would have paid by the 17th. If they moved my due date to the 13th, I would have been late, because I would not have realized the date switch. Most customers did not notice, and that was the whole point.

The honest citizens were not aware that the due date had been moved, so they sent in their payments like always, which now meant they were late. Big Bank slapped them all with a late fee at twenty-nine bucks a pop. If they were late two months in a row, the bank jacked their interest rate up a whopping ten percent. Ouch!

Big Bank must want to be king of the hill because they pulled another fast one. They let a month go by without sending monthly statements to their customers. Because they did not receive a statement as their reminder, many customers paid late, or missed paying that month. Big Bank dinged them all with the $29 late fee.

When customers realized what happened, they called to complain. They had never received a statement! Blaming it on a computer mistake, Big Bank refused to remove the late fees! They stated that they are not required to mail a monthly statement, and it is the customer’s responsibility to know when to pay their bill.

These folks need a refresher course on responsibility to customer service!