

File a Complaint

The credit card companies rely very heavily on the hope that the average citizen is not aware of what is going on, and if they are aware, the banks rely on the fact that most people do not do anything about it. That is because most think they can't. Now we know better.

You can fight back by reporting your credit card issuers to the proper authorities, and I will give you that information below. If our elected officials get enough complaints, maybe, just maybe, some legislation will be enacted to curb the craziness, and the greed, of the credit card industry.

Who to Contact

1. Your state's Attorney General's office. Most people would probably never think of contacting their state attorney general. The office seems too official or intimidating, not something that an ordinary citizen could have contact with, but they are in essence the top dog lawyer for your state. They work for you. These attorneys know their stuff and are aggressive.

This is exactly the place where you want to start. The attorney general will listen to your complaint, and more importantly, will act on your complaint. They keep track of all complaints filed. Even if you are the first one, when the next guy makes a complaint, and then the next guy, they all add up. The attorney general will not know of the corrupt goings-on unless you notify them of your complaint.

Most of the lawsuits that have been filed against the credit card companies came from attorney generals. The Providian case was set in motion by the California Attorney General. It all started with one complaint.

You should be able to find your state attorney general's office listed at www.naag.org.

2. Elected Representatives. Yes, I know I have been telling you that the Washington officials and the banking officials are joined at the hip pocket. They are. Campaign contributions make the world go round. They have their good old boys (and girls) network, and that is a fact. It is also a fact that these people are
