

sad fact of the matter is that the Commerce Department statistics show that people are actually spending one percent more than they earned. People really are falling into a financial hole. That figure is the worst since the Depression era, but hey, ask the feds and the lenders, and they'll say that everything is peachy keen. Maybe for them, but for the average American citizen, times are tough.

Americans'
savings:
"...the worst since the Depression era."

According to the CNNMoney website, consumer spending accounts for seventy percent of the U.S. gross domestic product. Their website states, "The world economy is leveraged to the U.S. consumer. And the U.S. consumer is leveraged to the hilt." David Wyss, a chief economist at Standard & Poor's, made the statement: "We've never had so many who owed so much."

Revolution

No one is more pleased than the credit card industry. Bankrate.com states that 40% of credit card issuers' profits come from fee income. They pat themselves on the back for another great year and light up fat cigars. Meanwhile, the most common New Year's resolution for many Americans has become "to get out of debt." Resolutions used to be typical things like, "lose ten pounds," "find my true love," or "keep the house clean." Now, most Americans are buried with debt that has escaped their control, simply because the lending industry is out of control; and the number one concern for today's hard working bill-paying citizen is to get out of debt.

Meanwhile, the credit card companies drop millions each year in congressional campaign contributions. It is no surprise that any legislation that comes out of Washington basically rolls out the red carpet for the credit card companies to steal the American public blind.

George Orwell once said, "In a time of universal deceit, telling the truth becomes a revolutionary act." Call me a revolutionary.

Debt Cures was written specifically for you, to get you out of their control. Now the only thing for you to be concerned about is thinking up a new New Year's resolution.
