

The sale of his current house fell through when the buyer's employer was bought out by a foreign company. The buyer lost his job. The bank would not give him a mortgage with no job. That meant, "no contract." Anthony no longer had a buyer for his house. Anthony's purchase contract on the country property was not contingent on the sale of his current house, because he thought it was a sure thing. Anthony was now stuck with two mortgages that he could not afford.

His banker had known that this was a possibility, but gladly gave him two full mortgages, no offer of a bridge loan, and no friendly advice that the payments of two mortgage loans might be too steep for Anthony's income. The lender had all his financial information and ignored basic customer service. He only saw a jackpot for himself. With a smile, the banker said, "Glad that I could help you out."

We use our credit cards
52 million
times a day.

Who helped who in this scenario? The banker is now collecting interest on two mortgages. Anthony is saddled with two house payments. By not defaulting on the mortgage payments, his other expenses are being paid by credit card. The situation is a freight train ready to derail. Maybe it could have been avoided if the helpful, friendly banker had given financial advice, or had simply looked carefully at Anthony's income, and said, "I'm sorry, but you don't qualify for two mortgages." Instead, he just looked at the dollars that would be coming to him and his bank.

There are more stories than you would ever care to read about people who get caught up in debt. It happens so quickly. Something puts us in a bind, and we turn to our credit cards to make it through. I imagine that since you are flipping the pages of Debt Cures, you or someone close to you needs the solutions and the methods to get out of debt and on to the real task at hand, creating wealth. Everything in this book applies to each of us. Get out of debt. Get on your way to wealth. The credit card industry may delight in our pain, but our pain is no more.

Fire Eating Sword Swallowers

What irks me is that the financial lending industry does not have to be so greedy. They are doing just fine, and the credit card banks needn't