

Slaying the Dragons

"Perhaps I am stronger than I think."

~ Thomas Merton

The banks and the credit card companies want to keep you under their thumb, making you think that they hold the control and that you must bow to their every command. Hogwash and poppycock. Truth be told, you are not at the mercy of the banks, but they don't want you to know it!

The credit card companies need us, the average worker bees, the honest citizens of America. The competition among banks and credit card companies is fierce, and they need to maintain and attract new customers. If lowering your interest rate keeps you as a customer, they probably will do it. You may have to talk to a supervisor, but when it is your money at stake, talk to ten people if you have to. Threatening to switch to another credit card bank usually works. It is the card issuer who is faced with a choice: Give you a fair rate and still make some money; or don't lower the rate, and not get another dime off this account, because you can, and will, switch banks.

Don't be intimidated and don't give up. Persistence pays off! After the first telephone call you make with a successful result, I guarantee
