January 10, 2007. 8:10 pm. Telephone call from Bob Bulldog from Expert Liars Collection Agency. Bob wanted a payment on a credit card debt to MegaBank. He said the debt was $4000. I said I didn't know about such a debt. He kept talking. I told him that a debt to MegaBank didn't ring a bell, and asked if he could send me all the information he had on this alleged debt. I told him to not call me at home and to not call me at work. I told him to communicate with me only in writing. Bob did not seem happy, but was not rude. Bob said he would put my request in his files.

This notebook is off to a great start. Notice that the collection agent already did one thing that he is not supposed to do. He called after 8:00 pm. Usually, debt collectors don't wilt on the first try. Bob called back.

January 11, 2007. 8:30 pm. Collection Agent Bob called again. I said that I had asked him not to call me, and that I had sent off a letter today, putting the request in writing. He cut me off and said that they didn't have any letter yet. He said this account was seriously delinquent, and he expected payment. He said it was his job to keep calling until the debt was satisfied. He was belligerent and said he would call my boss and garnish my wages to get the debt paid off. I said he had no right to do that under the Fair Practices Act. I told him to stop calling me and that if he didn't, I would file a complaint with the attorney general and the FTC. I hung up.

It is a very easy thing to do, to keep a record like this. Again, the collection agent called after the hours allowed, and this time, he made a bogus threat. When the very first call happens, you do not know how it will progress, so it is wise to keep a record. Try to jot down exact quotes of what the collection agent said, like, "I will call your boss."

Don't let them bully you. With the methods provided in Debt Cures, you can free yourself from debt collectors, once and for all.

Modern Day Pirates

Collection agency employees take pride in their tenacious ability to use fear or humiliation on their unsuspecting prey. Good old-fashioned scare tactics work on a vast majority of people. Grace was certain that
