

There is a long laundry list of threats that all the collectors are notorious for bellowing. One of their all-time favorites is: “I’ll garnish your wages!” The truth is that, no, the debt collection agency will not garnish your wages. Most of the time, they have zero power to touch your wages. Nil, nada, none. They must have a judgment against you to do so. A judgment means that there was a lawsuit against you that went to court. You would be fully aware if they had gone to court and someone won a judgment against your wages. No lawsuit, no wage garnishment. Don’t let them convince you otherwise. And believe me, they will try.

They can't take your house or throw you in jail.

Another extremely common intimidation tactic is to threaten that he or she can take your house. Too many people think this is a true danger! They worry themselves sick, thinking that they’re going to lose their home. The collection agency cannot take your house, unless the debt they are bothering you about is a debt that is secured by your house. That would only be your mortgage or a home equity loan. Most all other loans are not secured by your house. They love this bogus tactic because it gets people to pay. They have no right and no power to come after your house. Don’t believe them!

Sad but true, threats of violence are still a part of the collection racket. The modern collection agents still use thinly-veiled threats, like “We know where you live!” as if a big bruiser of a guy is going to show up, grab you from your house, and throw you in the trunk of a big black car. You are not going to get your knee caps broken or end up at the bottom of the river. Some of these collection guys are as bad as thugs, and sometimes do threaten or imply harm may come your way. They just want to scare you. Such threats are illegal and you need to file a complaint with the FTC.

Empty Threats

Don’t fall for their empty threats. You have debt trouble at the moment, period. End of story. This too shall pass. The guy calling you and harassing you could very easily be making a six-figure income, and he has no real sympathy for you or what you are going through. Your
