It is outrageous and ridiculous what the lenders and banks and corporations are getting away with, and it is mind-boggling that the US government slaps them heartily on the back and allows them to make their money by screwing the American citizen. Banks and lenders and credit card companies are taking advantage of people. I say, enough is enough. Let's expose the industry, and let's take control of our debt and our lives again.

The credit card issuers are playing a numbers game. They could issue you one credit card with a $10,000 limit, but they don't. They don't make their money that way. The same bank will offer you ten cards with a $1,000 limit on each card so it can hit each card with fees. They hate people who have just one card, and they hate people who pay their bill each month. Sure, the credit card company gets a small fee for each purchase you make with the card, but that is not enough for them. They have succumbed to the green monster called greed.

It is not a fabrication that a person with a balance of $1000 can go over their limit by $1 or pay one day late and be buried with fees. By making the minimum monthly payment alone, the balance will grow like a snowball rolling down the mountain, and the individual is hit with an avalanche of a huge bill. That $1000 can become $2000, $3000, $4000, even $5000. But wait a minute, all that person really owes is the $1000 – the rest is industry-created FEES!

It happens to all of us. My friend Kelly only uses a Visa card and pays the balance each month. She was shopping at the mall one afternoon and was enticed to open a department store credit card in order to save 15% that day. She charged $65. Kelly did not receive the first bill timely in the mail, and paid one day late, but that does not matter. She received a late charge assessment of $29. That's 45% of the balance she owed. A bank or credit card issuer is not allowed to charge 45% interest, but by calling it a "fee," it is fair game. A telephone call to the company received no sympathy, no "sorry," and no solution. A hit of 45% certainly washes out any savings of 15% on the $65 purchase. Opening a new credit card to save money obviously did not turn out
