

to keep future generations in the dark. Why educate the golden goose when you can continue to take the eggs? It's just another example of the American public getting screwed. How ironic that your tax dollars and mine are spent on an education system that not only is failing in the areas of reading, science, and math, but personal finance as well.

They want to screw us. I say, screw them. It's okay to get angry, as long as you then get busy.

Taking Care of Business

We can grumble all we want, but the best way to fight back is to, well, fight back. We know what they are up to, and we can counterattack.

Earlier pages spent a lot of ink explaining credit reports and credit scores. Now you know:

- ✓ Get your credit report.
- ✓ Review your credit report very carefully.
- ✓ Correct errors/remove false information.

Ninety percent of all credit reports have errors, so you better believe it is worth your while to check yours over completely. A lot of credit scores are bad simply because the credit report has misinformation. Dispute. Correct. Monitor. Your credit report continues to evolve, so you need to continue to review it periodically.

Your credit score, a three-digit number, is the only number you need to think about right now. Forgot about your high school batting average, your IQ, or what the bathroom scale showed this morning. Your credit score is your financial report card, and you want high marks. Improve your credit score overnight by doing the steps listed in Chapter 11. Once you have boosted your score, keep it there:

1. Pay on time.
2. Never skip a payment.
3. Make at least the minimum payment, more if possible.
