

The FICO powers-that-be believed that people were taking advantage of this method and some people who had good credit were allowing those with bad credit to become an authorized user on their account – for a fee. The credit gurus wanted to shut them down and in doing so have created a very unfair mess. And actually, why should they care if a consumer paid someone else for the benefit of their good credit? Consumers pay for all kinds of ways to help improve their credit score. BINGO! That's it. The big guys running the show don't want improved credit scores! They want to keep you and your score down, so they can keep their fees and profits up. I bet if they could figure out a way to do it, they'd say you can't read books on how to improve your credit score!

The piggyback method has now been shut down, whether you were hopping onto the credit of a trusted family member or someone you didn't know. (FICO now maintains that paying a fee to piggyback on someone else's good credit amounts to fraud, so if you did pay for such a service, have your name removed from those accounts. And if you had good credit and allowed someone to pay you to piggyback on your credit, now is the time to end that practice.) The FICO people estimate that 30% of everyone in their system has an additional user named on their accounts. That's over 60 million people affected by this new change. Do they honestly think that 60 million people are paying someone for the privilege of their good credit? Get real. They do not want credit scores to go up, plain and simple!

Now with the new rule, the second user name on an account will not get that account included in their credit score, causing their score to drop. Included in that 60 million is a whole generation of women out there who are the added users on their husbands' accounts. Everything was set up together when they got married and everything has hubby's name first. That was the way of our society. That now means that these women have just lost their good credit rating. That is the way of our credit society. If these women become divorced or widowed, all those years of good payment history will not do them one bit of good. The system is rigged against the honest American citizen.

Once again, let me remind you, knowledge is power. This is just one more example of what they don't want you to know about, but now that you do know, the time is now. The time for what? The time
