

There is an ancient tale of a Russian archer. He was a small man who didn't talk much, but he was known throughout the village as the best marksman. His bow and arrow were amazingly accurate, nothing but bull's-eyes. The trees of the forest were marked with target circles, and his arrows were found dead center in the middle of the circle every time. The czar of Russia was passing through their tiny hamlet and witnessed all the clean targets with the arrows perfectly landed. He demanded to speak to this amazing archer.

“How can it be that you hit your target perfectly every time?”

“It is simple,” the archer replied. “I shoot the arrow and then I draw the target.”

Bull's-eye

Today the world is full of people trying to make big bucks quickly off of eBay. They often have the wrong approach. Most people scour their homes and garages and attics and basements, trying to find stuff that they can unload, and they have visions of huge dollars dancing in their heads. People don't want your junk.

Or some folks buy up worthless stuff in bulk and hope to peddle it for a profit. Then they are stuck with 2,000 pink plastic back scratchers when they realize that there is no demand for them.

Don't fall into that trap. First, you must determine what the demand is, and then you be the one to supply it. What are purchasers searching for on eBay? That is what you want to sell. Find the items that people are looking for. Find it for them and you will make a profit.

You might have the entire Bee Gees collection on vinyl, in mint condition, but if there is no demand, your supply will just sit. If the hot search is for Joan Baez records, find them fast and cheap, and sell them to the demanding public.
