

financial assistance to low-income families. They are intent upon attacking poverty in our country, and for years, they have demonstrated that through community outreach, job training, counseling, food donations, and on-demand transportation programs. Learn more about them at www.communityactionpartnership.com.

You can also go to www.govbenefits.gov to learn more about a variety of emergency grants. And if you want to pick up your phone book and call a local charity organization, you'll be surprised to find that there are ways in which they can help with things like food, shelter, and education. Calling your local Salvation Army can make all the difference, if you're in need of financial assistance. To learn more, you can go to www.salvationarmy.org.

Finally, you can always go to your local Public Assistance office to apply for the funds that you need. In some states, they offer free money to people who are still waiting for other grants to pan out. The amount varies from state to state, but it's worth a call to check and see what's available!

When an emergency situation disrupts your way of living, there are always resources that you can rely upon. Take advantage of them when you need them!

Free Vacation Anyone?

The USDA Forest Service (FS) offers a great volunteer program that involves traveling to various sites throughout the year. All you need to bring with you is a sense of adventure, as you will find yourself engaged in various archaeological and historical preservation projects.

The program is called Passport in Time, and there is no fee required to join. All you have to do is find your own way to get to the site, and in some cases, Passport in Time might provide you with food and a
