Study Abroad – Free of Charge

Ever fantasize about pursuing your education in some exotic overseas locale? The U.S. Department of Education has all kinds of programs designed for current students to travel abroad. They're handing out free money to encourage students and educational institutions to become more involved in foreign language and area studies. If you're a student looking to experience another country, or if you're a teacher interested in leading a group to study abroad, contact the Department of Education. They give free money to fund traveling and living expenses! You can learn more at www.ed.gov/programs/iegpsflasf/index.html.

In addition, see <http://www.worldstudy.gov/overview2.html> for scholarships and fellowships that provide significant funding for study abroad, in amounts of up to $20,000 and even $30,000 for study in both the United States and abroad.

The National Security Education Programs funds Boren Fellowships, which provide grad students the opportunity to study languages and cultures that are deemed important to US national security. Students who desire a career in the federal government and wish to take coursework abroad should consider this opportunity. Fellowships are up to $30,000. Applications must be completed online. See <http://www.iie.org/programs/nsep/graduate/award.htm>.

That Exists??

There are programs out there that all of us can qualify for. Of course, all of us can't qualify for every single one of them, but if we make the calls and do the research, we will find the free money that we're looking for. There are programs for everything. I repeat: everything. There are programs for things that you could never even imagine.

The Senior Farmers' Market Nutrition Program (SFMNP) is a great one. Through it, seniors receive money to buy fresh, locally-grown fruits and vegetables from farmers' markets and roadside stands. It's a
