As with most sports and games in life, golf being the one exception that comes to mind, people with the highest scores win. With a credit score, individuals with the highest scores get the best interest rates and the credit offers with the lowest fees. It would seem logical, to Spock and to me, that the lenders would be most interested in those folks who have proven to be a good credit risk – the ones who pay their bills on time each month and the ones who pay off their balances with every statement. Surprisingly, the people with average or below average credit scores are the ones that the credit card companies salivate over like a big, juicy steak.

This midrange group is what puts the twinkle in the banker’s eye and the fat in his wallet. These are the people who use credit, make late payments from time to time, go over the limit every now and then, and essentially give the lender every opportunity to stick the borrower with fees, fees, and more fees.

That is the ultimate goal of the credit card companies; they don’t ideally want the excellent credit risk person who pays off the balance
